WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

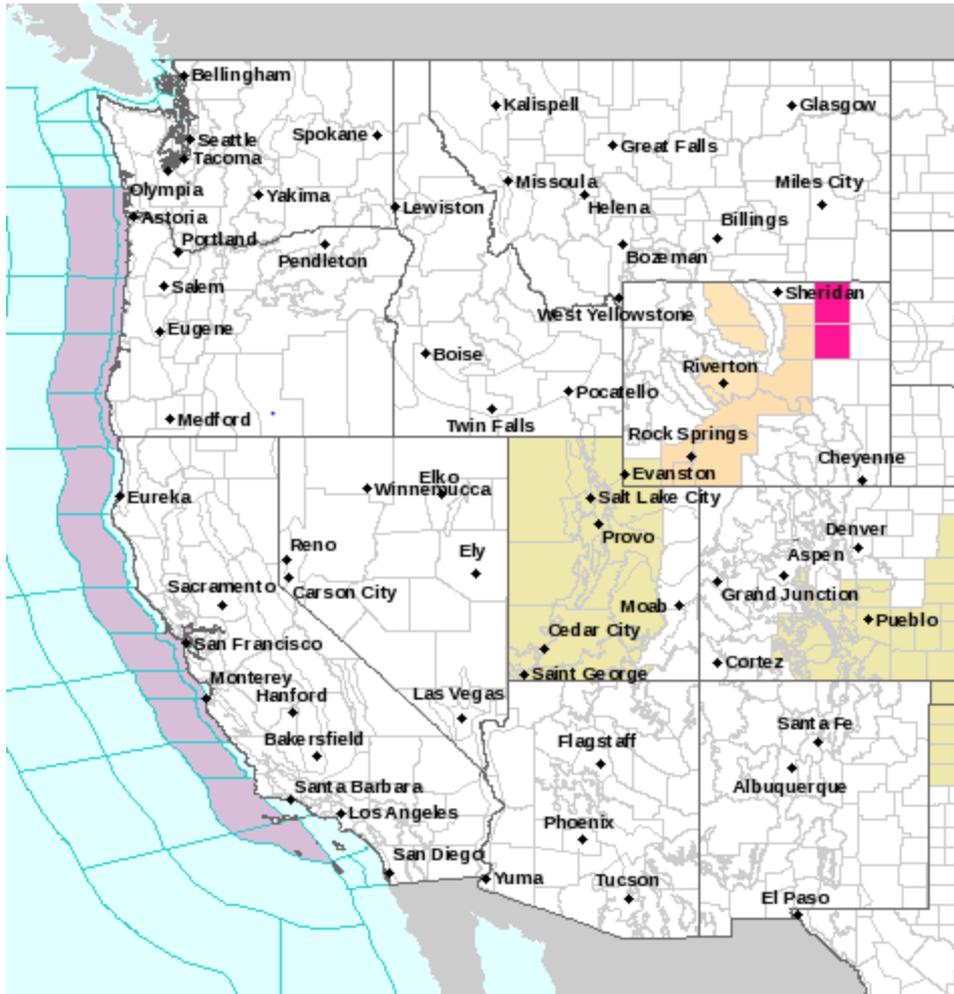

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

A low pressure trough will remain offshore this weekend. A southwest flow aloft will prevail over Northern California causing gusty afternoon southwest to west winds of 22-32 mph to surface at higher elevations and east of the Cascade-Sierra Crest each day through Sunday. The strongest of these winds will come this afternoon. A weakening frontal band within the trough is producing showers and thunderstorms near the Central Oregon Coast. Northern California will be partly cloudy, mild and locally breezy through this weekend, with more cloudiness in northern areas. There is a slight chance of a stray rain shower in far Northern California Saturday night and Sunday as the frontal band moves east across Oregon. On Monday a closed low pressure area will form within the trough and begin moving toward Northwest California. The low will eventually move across Northwest and Northern California and into Southern Oregon late in the week. There is a chance of showers or isolated thunderstorms in the far northern end of Northern California each day next week, with better chances toward the end of the week when the low passes through. However, the amount of activity each day will likely be quite limited and cover only a small area. The remainder of the region will be mostly sunny to partly cloudy with near normal temperatures and afternoon southwest to west breezes.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Strong high pressure centered over Arizona will maintain well above normal temperatures through Saturday, with upper-70s and 80s across the mountains and 90s to 103 in the valleys. The strong high pressure will drop southward into Mexico bringing a few degrees of cooling to the region Sunday. Winds will be light through Sunday. An area of low pressure will form off the Northern California Coast Monday and move inland Thursday causing temperatures to cool to near normal across most of the area. Westerly afternoon winds of 15 to 25 mph with gusts to 40 mph will surface across the desert passes Monday through Thursday. The marine layer will deepen to around 2,000 feet and morning low clouds and fog will move part way into the coastal valleys by Tuesday. Minimum relative humidity will be mainly between 12% and 25% away from the coastal areas through the middle of next week.
